“ Allison the strength and courage with which you faced each day will forever be a benchmark (matched only by your smile). . . reading through the many tributes to you today one word. . . one word stands out. . . FRIEND. Many were blessed to know you for a lifetime and others were lucky enough to have met you. . . I fall into that second group and thank goodness I did. . . thank you for your friendship.

Sending prayers to Jamie and the girls. . . in your image and with their daddy by their side they will continue grow to amazing young women (but you already knew that). May the blanket of the many memories you all have and the faith you share serve to comfort each of them in their sorrow.

God Bless!

“ My thoughts of Allison are centered around one word, friend. That’s what we all felt like when we were around Allison. We were her friend. But a person’s life and legacy are not measured by how many friends they have, or who their friends are but rather how that person makes their friends feel, keeps their friends and teaches their friends. And Allison was all of that.

To my friend...

The one that was there for other people and not herself when they were down.

To my friend...

The one that fought oh so courageously to the last day.

To my friend...

The first person that called me to offer condolences when my father passed away even though she was sick and battling cancer.

To my friend...

That told me she loved me too many times to count.

To my friend...

That religiously went to church to pray for others, and not herself.

To my friend...

That held her family so close to her heart.

To my friend...

That said her friends were in her heart.

To my friend...

That was more concerned about how other people felt than herself.

To my friend...

That when she was down the most would say, “tomorrows a new day”!

I'm quite sure when Allison arrived in heaven with all the other people waiting to cross over, they singled her out and said, right this way, we've been expecting you.

To my friend I say, thanks for being my friend and allowing me to be in your life. You've taught me not only how to love people but also how to be a friend. To that I say thank you, my friend.

“God has another angel ... my beautiful cousin Allison ... you graced this world with your incredible spirit, wry sense of humor beauty and love. You are so incredibly loved and will be missed greatly by SO many. We promise we will embrace and support and LOVE your precious daughters for the rest of their lives ... and Jamie, your Dad and brothers too. With love from your "favorite" cousin ~ Paige Yauger
